Potholes State Park

The State Parks in Washington State encompass over 125 parks. Included as one of those parks is the "Potholes State Park", which derives its name from geologic formations that are shallow depressions created during the Pleistocene flooding of this area that are now lakes.

The construction of O'Sullivan Dam created the reservoir that forms one boundary of the park. The park also features natural sandy beaches and a multitude of family recreational activities including boating, camping, fishing, hiking, picnicking and playgrounds. 509-346-2759 Columbia National Wildlife Refuge The Columbia National Wildlife Refuge provides a sanctuary for Wildlife of all varieties. It provides many hours of opportunity for Wildlife viewing and thousands of people visit each year to enjoy the refuge and it's inhabitants. The Refuge includes 23,000 acres located in the Scablands of the Columbia River Basin. It is surrounded by sagebrush, grasslands and many small lakes. The area's irrigated farmlands, generally mild winters, and generous native and agricultural vegetation provide a secure environment for the large numbers of migrating and wintering ducks, geese, and many other varieties of waterfowl.
